Argument

Writing a Master thesis can pose some challenges as it is considered as a big project for our Master students. As they progress through their degree, they may have questions on exactly how to write a Master's thesis and are thus looking to obtain some thesis writing tips to help them on their way. Therefore, it is helpful to consider the basic strategies and ways throughout the process of writing it. In this training day, we will clue them in to some strategies best suited to Master students trying to complete a thesis. We will focus on what to expect at each stage, including creating a working plan, reviewing the literature, undertaking research, writing their master's thesis, editing it, and leaving time to finish and proofread. In this regard, this training day is planned to provide Master students with a comprehensive guide to writing a Master's thesis which all gravitates around mechanisms and strategies pertaining to a successful completion of a Master dissertation and to explain the meaning of research methodology and the purpose and importance of writing a research chapter for Master theses. It discusses what to include and not to include in a research methodology section, the different approaches to research methodology that can be used. Hopefully, by the end of this training day, our MA students will have the confidence and motivation to get going on a path that will lead to ultimate success in your thesis writing.

Presentation papers are invited on issues related to the following themes and others that fall within the scope of the training day's topic:

- Researching and Writing a Dissertation
- Master's Dissertation Structure
- Research Methods for Master Researchers
- Research Methodology
- Research Methods
- Research Design
- Quantitative and Qualitative Research Design
- The Difference Between Research Method and Research Methodology
- Quantitative and Qualitative Data Analysis
- Drafting Research Proposal
